The Bill of Privileges

Drafted: July 2, 2026

An enumeration of interdependent privileges for adherents of the Constitution of The Mangos, grounded in the principle that what is right is not based on what is true — but on what was sacrificed for it to be so.

"Our fathers wrote in hindsight towards a time / when Rights toward man existed not in kind"

— Paul Jefferson Richards, Sonnet of Rights, 2004

Preamble

We hold these truths: that all persons are created equal, that all persons' creations are equally co-created — with God, with community, with the accumulated sacrifices of those who came before — and that no set of words alone can define an entitled property of a person. A right has so many entendres that its accurateness is no longer based in truth. Therefore, we do not claim rights. We claim privileges — blessings earned through sacrifice, maintained through accountability, and available equally to all who choose to adhere.

A privilege exists only because others agree to recognize it. That recognition is not free. It costs attention, loyalty, and the continuous act of not-betraying. The opposite of a privilege is not oppression — it is untestedness. A person with no history is not without privileges; they are simply unproven.

These privileges are interdependent. None stands alone. Each one requires the others to function, just as optionality and loyalty are not real without each other. Because all creations are co-creations, no privilege herein belongs to the individual in isolation — each is exercised within and sustained by the web of interdependence. No privilege herein shall be construed to diminish the unalienable endowments of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, nor to create distinctions among persons except by the voluntary measure of their own conduct and sacrifice.

I. The Privilege to Model

Every adherent has the privilege to construct, express, and revise models of natural phenomena using natural and artificial languages, visual media, sound, code, and any other medium that stimulates multiple senses. This privilege is the foundation from which all others derive. Without the freedom to model, neither individuality nor functional growth can exist. Yet no model is built in isolation — every model is a co-creation, drawing upon the axioms, languages, and sacrifices of those who came before.

This privilege carries a duty: consistency and acknowledgment. A model must be built from axioms that the modeler is willing to defend, revise, or abandon when context demands it. The modeler does not claim absolute truth — only axiom-based truth tested against sacrifice. And the modeler does not claim sole authorship — only stewardship of a co-creation entrusted to their particular attention.

II. The Privilege of Expenditure as Expression

How an adherent spends their money is an act of speech. The allocation of resources — time, labor, capital — toward a person, product, or enterprise constitutes a declaration of values. This privilege recognizes that financial behavior is not separable from identity.

This privilege carries a duty: transparency within the Dunbar Calculus of Value. An adherent's expenditures that bear upon the shared risk pool of the family or community are voluntarily disclosed to the degree that they affect collective indemnification. This disclosure is contractual — entered into freely by the adherent upon adoption of the Family Charter — and shall not be compelled by surveillance, search, or seizure beyond the bounds of the adherent's own consent.

III. The Privilege of Self-Defamation

Every adherent has the privilege to publish, express, or embody whatever version of themselves they choose — including versions that may later damage their own reputation, employability, or social standing. The emo phase, the tall-tees-to-the-knees phase, the ecclesiastical season — these are sovereign acts of self-authorship.

This privilege carries a duty: ownership. Self-defamation cannot be retroactively blamed on others. The adherent who exercises this privilege accepts that historical records persist, and that the community may develop instruments (insurance, data hygiene, PR coordination) to mitigate — but not erase — the consequences. The right to reinvention does not annul the record; it layers upon it. Nothing in this duty compels an adherent to testify against themselves or to disclose past expressions beyond what is publicly available.

IV. The Privilege of Quantified Risk

All persons are created equal; their sacrifices are not. Every adherent has the privilege to have their contribution to a shared enterprise weighted not only by the net present value of their labor or capital, but by the proportion of personal risk undertaken relative to their total risk profile. Equal persons may make unequal sacrifices — and the act of risking one's entire livelihood represents a different magnitude of sacrifice than risking one's surplus, even when the dollar figures are identical. This privilege honors the sacrifice, not the person's station.

This privilege carries a duty: disclosure. To claim risk-weighted equity, one must make visible the full landscape of assets, liabilities, and coverage at stake. The operating agreement is the skeleton key — but it only works when the lock is honestly presented. No adherent may use this privilege to claim superior personhood — only to claim fair recognition of what was given up.

V. The Privilege of Indemnified Boundaries

Every adherent has the privilege to translate their insurance exclusions into behavioral boundaries without shame. If a policy excludes coverage for an activity, the refusal to engage in that activity is not cowardice — it is fiduciary discipline. The boat does not sail after sundown. The cannabis work does not proceed under professional liability. The bylaws are not arbitrary rules; they are the semantic edges where coverage ends and personal exposure begins.

This privilege carries a duty: the Boxer Strategy. Holding the indemnification does not excuse reckless behavior. The prophylactic is not a license. Active prevention is a duty, not an option.

VI. The Privilege of Toleration

Every adherent has the privilege to encounter models, axioms, and entendres that are unfamiliar, uncomfortable, or contradictory to their own — and to not be forced into agreement. Toleration is not approval. It is the discipline of allowing another's model to exist long enough to be understood before it is accepted or rejected.

This privilege carries a duty: engagement over dismissal. The tolerant mind does not refuse to listen. It listens, weighs, and then chooses — with logos, ethos, and pathos in deliberation. In the extreme form, toleration leads to appreciation.

VII. The Privilege of Worship

Every adherent has the privilege to practice worship according to their own orientation, free from compulsion by any other adherent or by MANGOS itself. No religious test shall be imposed for participation in this community. We observe, however, that all humans orient their habits toward something — a craft, a family, a God, a routine, an ambition — and that this orientation functions as worship whether or not it is named as such.

This privilege carries a duty: self-awareness. The adherent is encouraged — never compelled — to identify what commands their long-term happiness, their habits, and their sacrifices. Naming what one worships is an act of honesty that strengthens the Dunbar Calculus of Value. It is never a prerequisite for belonging.

VIII. The Privilege to Not Listen

Every adherent has the privilege to choose their ignorances deliberately. Attention is finite, biologically constrained to approximately 150 meaningful relationships. Every manufactured narrative, every algorithmic feed, every engineered outrage that hijacks attention evicts a real person from cognition. This privilege does not extend to judicial or deliberative proceedings in which an adherent has agreed to participate — in such proceedings, the right to be heard by one's peers is preserved.

This privilege carries a duty: accountability for what is ignored. Chosen ignorance is a calculation, not an excuse. When an adherent's chosen ignorance results in harm to another within their Dunbar sphere, the ignorance does not shield them from the Responsibility Index.

IX. The Privilege of the Underwriting Cycle

Every adherent has the privilege to anticipate, prepare for, and insure against risks that do not yet have mainstream recognition. When a hashtag becomes a lawsuit, when a cultural anxiety becomes a policy exclusion, when bespoke fears become standard norms — the adherent who prepared early is not paranoid. They are prudent.

This privilege carries a duty: sharing the signal. When an adherent identifies an emerging risk that may affect the community, they have a duty to bring it to deliberative assembly — not as panic, but as preparation. The underwriting cycle of reality moves from excess-and-surplus to mainstream. We track it together.

X. The Privilege of Legacy

Every adherent has the privilege to build structures — financial, relational, institutional — that outlast their own biological life. The rent-to-equity model, the family charter, the operating agreement with net-present-value equity distribution — these are instruments of posterity, not greed.

This privilege carries a duty: the duty to honor mothers and fathers. Legacy is not built in a vacuum. It is built upon the sacrifices of those who came before — including sacrifices we did not ask for and may not fully understand. We do not just survive. We survive with certainty, and we survive with vitality.

Closing

These privileges are not entitlements. They cannot be demanded from the universe. They exist only insofar as the community of adherents agrees to recognize, protect, and hold each other accountable to them. A privilege without accountability is merely a wish. A privilege with accountability is a covenant.

This Bill is subservient to and complementary with the Constitution of The Mangos, which is itself subservient to the constitutions of the nations in which we reside. No privilege enumerated herein shall be construed to contradict the Declaration of Independence, the United States Constitution and its Amendments, or the equal protection of any person under the law. Where any statement in this Bill appears to conflict with those founding documents, the founding documents govern, and the statement shall be interpreted in the manner most consistent with equal creation, due process, and the consent of the governed.

The enumeration of these ten privileges shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the adherents — in keeping with the spirit of the Ninth Amendment.

Drafted in good faith, under the jurisdiction of MANGOS.

"Simple, but no simpler."
